Since coming to power, Mr. Gor-bachev had added four allies to what is now a 13-member Politburo, the decision-making council, and three to the 11-member Secre-tariat of the Communist Party's Central Committee. The Secretariat handles day-to-day affairs.

In addition to shifting Mr. Gro-myko, 75, and naming Eduard A. Shevardnadze, 57, to the Politburo and the job of foreign minister, Mr. Gorbachev dismissed the man who had been seen as his chief rival among the younger Politburo members — Grigori V. Romanov, the former Leningrad Communist

Mr. Gorbachev's decisions, in true Kremlin style, have been made in secret and announced publicly only to the accompaniment of a nous show of hands at the nation's pro-forma parliament.

In his Kremlin moves and in the television appearances, in which he both cajoles and threatens, he has demonstrated the aptness of Mr. Gromyko's description of him in a speech in March supporting his as-cent to leadership: "Comrades, this man has a nice smile, but he has iron teeth."

Nowhere was this trait more evident than in his shift of Mr. Gromyko, a move described by a Westmyso, a move described by a wist-ern diplomat as "an elegant solution" that allowed him to award a supporter while apparently taking control of foreign policy.

Immediately after making the change, Mr. Gorbachev demonstrated his readiness to move ahead with foreign policy, announcing Wednesday his first visits to the West as the Soviet leader, to Paris in October and to Geneva in November for a meeting with President Ronald Reagan.

The announcements foreshadow a more active foreign policy than the Soviet Union has seen since the mid-1970s, a period of ailing lead-

Maintaining an army of occupa-tion in Lebanon has also proved expensive to Syria, which now spends about half of its annual budget on military matters.

The Israeli withdrawal may have convinced the Syrian command that it no longer needs such a large armored force in an area where Syrian forces once confronted Israeli troops.

China Frees Bishop Held For 30 Years

By John F. Burns New York Times Service BELJING - The 83-year-old Chinese prelate recognized by the Vatican as bishop of Shanghai, the Reverend Ignatius Kung, has been released from prison after spending nearly 30 years in jail, the Xinhna

Bishop King, whose Chinese name is Gong Pinmei, is the best-known of the hundreds of Chinese cleries who were persecuted by the Communists in the 1950s for their refusal to bow to a movement that severed ties between the Roman Catholic Church in China and the Vatican. He had first been imprisoned in 1955.

FORT DICK, California - For Andrew Tomasini, Thursday was the most exciting day since Feb. 27, 1911, when a ship bringing him from his native Italy sailed past the Statue of Liberty into New York harbor.

It was the culmination of a 74-year love affair with America for Mr. Tomasini.

He has not missed a parade on the Fourth of July since his arrival in United States as a lad of 17 from the village of Livemmo in the Italian Alps. But Thursday was the first time he actually would be in a parade.

Every year a prominent citizen of Del Norte County, a rural county on the Oregon border whose population is 18,000, is selected from various nominees submitted by local residents to lead the Independence Day parade through downtown Crescent City, the county seat.

Among the nominations this year was one from a woman describing an elderly man who had stood near her at last year's parade.

"I was so taken with the old man's obvious love for this country," the woman wrote. "When the American flag went by, he put his hand on his heart, tears came to his eyes and he said: 'I'm proud to be an American.' What a perfect grand marshal that old man would be for our Fourth of July parade."

The man was Andrew Tomasini, saloonkeeper of Fort Dick, population 400. He was unanimously chosen by the committee to be grand marshal.

Mr. Tomasini has operated his old-fashioned By Charles Hillinger

The Fort Dick Tavern opens every day at 2 P.M. and stays open until Mr. Tomasini gets tired and decides it is time to go to bed, which is usually about 8 o'clock.

I work six days a week and take Mondays of Mr. Tomasini said.

And Thursday, the 91-year-old Mr. Tomasini was to have his day, sitting stop a covered wagon, leading the Del Norte County Fourth of July parade through the streets of Crescent City with 85 bands, floats and marching groups behind him.

Wales Voting Hostage Spokesman Rethinks Words Tests Labor's Conwell Plans to Review Remarks on Attitude to Captors Comeback

By R.W. Apple Jr.

BRECON, Wales — The most significant political skirmish of Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher's second term has been taking place the last two weeks in the bucolic hills and dales of southeastern Wales, and Mrs. Thatcher appears likely to be the big loser.

The cause of all the commotion, in a region where the lambing season usually provides the big excitement of the year, is a by-election Thursday to choose a new member of Parliament for the constituency known as Brecon and Radnor. He will replace a Conservative, Tom Hooson, who died recently.

But the Tories' popularity, and that of Mrs. Thatcher, has been slipping in recent months, partly because of her inability to reduce record unemployment and parily because of the comeback of the Labor Party, whose popular new leader, Neil Kinnock, is slowly steering it back toward the center.

A national poll taken by Market and Opinion Research Internation-al on June 21 showed the Conservatives trailing Labor by eight per-centage points, 40-32, with the Liberal-Social Democratic alliance

No "Star Wars"

Appeal to the Peoples of the World

Humanity faces the gravest danger: all life on our planet is threatened. In defiance of the clearly expressed will of millions of women and men of all continents and the overwhelming majority of governments, the U.S. preparations for "Star Wars" are going ahead relentlessly. The so-called Strategic Defence Initiative has nothing defensive about it.

Its actual purpose is to secure nuclear first-strike capability from behind a space shield, and thus threaten and dominate the whole world. That is why, while speeding up the space weapons programme, the United States has increased the rate of stockpiling strategic nuclear weapons, of stationing its medium-range nuclear missiles in Western Europe, and of the production of barbarous neutron, chemical and other weapons of mass destruction.

The militarisation of outer space would mean the start of a new extremely dangerous type of arms race, increasing confrontation and the threat of a global holocaust.

Peoples and governments pledged to peace from all over the world, welcome the beginning of the Soviet-American negotiations in Geneva, which provide a great opportunity to prevent the arms race in outer space, to stop and then reverse in on Earth, with the aim of total elimination of all nuclear weapons.

But the U.S. insistence on the implementation of its "Star Wars" plans threatens to

The "Star Wars" plans must be stopped now. The Geneva negotiations must succeed. We call on all peace movements and other non-governmental organisations, all peoples and governments which stand for the prevention of nuclear war, to raise their voices louder than ever in a world-wide campaign against the militarisation of outer space.

If the "Star Wars" plans are not stopped today, it could be too late tomorrow. No Star Wars! is the common call of all peace forces. Outer space must serve peace and progress.

Life as Hostage: Terror and Guided Tours

NEW YORK - No longer constrained by their captors, the Americans who were hijacked and held hostage in Lebanon are unburdening themselves of more of the details of their experiences in captivity.

Several have described a game of Russian roulette played by one hijacker, who would load his revolver with one bullet, spin the cylinder, aim at a hostage and pull the trigger. Ralf W. Traugott of Lunenburg. Massachusetts, told of spending four days and three nights being shown around Beirut by a commander of the Shiite militia.

He said the excursions included a tour of the line separating the Christian and Moslem districts of the city and a visit to the nighttime funeral of an Amal member.

After passports were taken from the passengers, two of them said they stealthily wrote their names on their stomachs in ink so they could be identified if killed.

Three groups of women had been released, and when I was passed by, my heart really sank," said one of them. Pamela Suke-forth, 45, "I really thought that was

One of the hijackers told Uli Derickson, the TWA flight's purser, that he would like to marry her.

"That's was the only time she lost control," said Dr. Toga. "The guy was serious about the proposal and it really threw Uli for a loop. She was crying and thinking about her family and the thought of being left behind with this guy."

Three members of the airliner's cockpit crew held a news conference to tell about their experiences aboard the plane, where they were kept separately from the hostage passengers, who were divided into small groups and scattered around Beirut. The crew members described alternating cruelty and

"Jihad" was a reference to the extremist Islamic Jihad movement, which has engaged in bombings and other violence.

Mr. Trangott, a Massachusetts car car dealer, said that the militiamen who held him captive in Beirut once offered him a chance to fire a machine gun from the upper-story window of a building. He did not accept the offer, he said.

He described four days touring the city with an Arnal commander known as Akal.

"He took me out and showed me around day after day, night after night," he recalled. "I told him I wanted to see this town. He took John L. Testrake, pilot of the me uptown and downtown, in the

Negotiating for Last Hostage: the Jet

NEW YORK — The Trans World Airlines Boeing 727 that was hijacked to Beirut remains on the tarmac there, and TWA officials say its release will require negotiation by the U.S. State Department. "I don't know what's happening to that plane at this point," Sally McElwreath, an airline representative, said Wednesday. "I know we're anxious to get it back." She said a report that a TWA crew was waiting at Cyprus to pick up the airliner was not true. A crew will be sent once diplomats work out release details, she said. "It's the State Department," she said. "We don't negotiate our planes. We go through diplomatic circles."

"I was appalled and embar-rassed," Mr. Conwell said. While there was an extraordinary closeness among the hostages throughout the ordeal, he said. there was also much dissent over conflicting attitudes toward their captors and the Shiites' views. "I heard and participated in dis-cussions that would probably best be not published," he said. "I emphasize that we were a highly diver-

In his role as spokesman for the group, Mr. Conwell said at a news conference on June 27 with ABC News, in response to a question whether the hostages were being "used" by their captors: "I certainly don't look at the Amal militia as being all benevolent in terms of, 'We want to do good for the hostages.' We understand, we are realists, and we understand they are utilizing the situation for their own best means." "Fortunately, or unfortunately whichever the case may be," he continued, "we find that many in our group have a profound sympathy for the cause, or for the reasons that the Amal have in saying, "Israel, free my people." Tuesday, during the flight to the United States, Mr. Conwell said that one former hostage, "in a meeting with some government of-ficials, indicated that I had said something pertaining to our rela-tionship with the Amal people that he took offense with."

"Basically," Mr. Conwell said, " think it was in reference to the statement I made that some of as

He added: "Our captors and my captors were two wild-eved fanalics intent on killing us. I have no sympathy whatsoever for those two individuals. I would like to state that those men should be caught they should be tried, and I feel they should be convicted." Mr. Conwell said he intended to review the transcripts and tapes of the statements be made as spokerman and would schedule a new; conference. He was not certain when it would be.

General Abrahamson has made at least three visits to London.

During his most recent visit, two weeks ago, he was asked if it were true that the United States did not really need allied research help on the project, that American science could "go it alone?"

General Abrahamson paused. "I think we have a capability to do these kinds of things," he said. "But remember, the one thing we can't go alone is, we can't provide for the common defense of the West. Our security is inextricably linked together. Therefore, it doesn't make sense to try and go it alone."

The News Was Covered

The issues cry to be sorted out in the debate over how American media handled the hostage crisis. Hot journalistic pursuit yielded gripping stories, and especially pictures, providing both the vital information and the vicarious participation in drama for which the public appears to have an immense interest. Sometimes lost, however, were the proper relationships between journalist and audience and source.

We are not talking here of whether all of us at the viewing end enjoyed the spectacle. No one, we trust, is blaming the messenger for dismal tidings, which included anguishing elements of personal and national duress.

Nor are we talking of the evident political purposes of the hijackers, or of the political overtones of statements made by some hostages in stressful passage. These elements were, unquestionably, part of the event and part of the legitimate story, as distasteful as they may have been to hear.

We are talking of the widespread sense that television helped those who had hijacked, mur-dered and held Americans to "humiliate" the United States beyond the extent inherent in events - rubbed it in. There were excesses of taste, and they cannot be condoned, no matter that the First Amendment certainly permits them. Some would say that the evident antidote entails a measure of discretion verging on self-censorship that is either unacceptable in a free society or unimaginable in an emotional. competitive crisis situation. But good taste should not be considered beyond the journalistic pale, least of all by journalists.

There is the further disquieting possibility that television afforded terrorists a means of direct, unseemly and unfair leverage upon President Reagan and in that way undermined or at least burdened his efforts to resolve the crisis in what he felt was the best way open to the United States. We take this possibility seriously, but we do not have the sense that this is what happened this time. We do not see that the ordeal of the hostages was extended or the price of their return bid up by the presence or conduct of television. The opposite seems as likely. Things got safer for the 39 once their captors decided to go the television route. It is the earlier kidnapped seven, still held unseen by hidden terrorists, who remain in peril.

We remain convinced that professionalism provides the best answers for avoiding exploitation by the stagers of events. The rules are right out of Journalism 1. Reporters should ask tough questions and explore the different aspects of the happening. When they cannot ask questions or compel answers, they should use the opportunities inherent in their command of air time and newsprint to present the story in context. These rules will go a long way toward easing questions from outside the news business and doubts from within.

In this instance, the coverage had, as usual, its disorderly and mindless moments. But the lapses seem to have been less important than the service to viewers who desperately wanted to know more about an event that they took to be a dark challenge to their country.

A Common Enterprise

In the summer of 1776, Americans considered themselves to be atrociously and most unjustly burdened by taxation. That com-plaint always astonished the British, not to mention the other Europeans, for by their standards the Americans were very lightly taxed. None of that has greatly changed over the succeeding two centuries.

Irritation with government in general, and suspicion of its intrusions, continue to charac-terize the American political mind at work. The Reagan administration, the worst of it along with the best, stands firmly in the national tradition. But there has to be more than that to the idea of the United States. Resentment of Washington would not alone hold together a highly disparate population.

If 1776 had been no more than a tax rebellion, it would have petered out like all other tax rebellions. The revolutionary movement became a serious matter at the point at which most Americans began to think that they had more in common with each other than with the places from which their families had originally come. Not only were they against British taxes, they found, but they were in favor of a new kind of citizenship that they defined in the first few lines of the Declaration of Independence - the part about inalienable rights and so forth. The idea was not only that the people were to improve the character of politics, but that this new politics was to improve the character of the people. This sense of the common enterprise has proved remarkably durable.

It is currently fashionable to argue that the United States is better off to the extent that people are left to use their resources wholly to pursue their own interests, no matter how crass and self-centered. There are many organizations in Washington this summer promoting that opinion, frequently for reasons that turn out to be related to the tax legislation now before Congress and whether the top rates should be even lower than President Reagan has proposed. But from the beginning the idea of the United States has been that government is not merely a necessity but a moral commitment requiring its citizens to contribute to the country's development in many ways.

Americans know that. But they rarely think about it in relatively pleasant and screne times like the present. Adversity brings the country and its ideas closer together; you saw it happen during the episode last month of the hijacked Americans and the murder of one of them. And now the Fourth of July has served its useful annual purpose of inviting Americans to recall the purpose for which their country was founded, and to consider whether this great enterprise does not require more than assailing the tax rate and George III.

Japan Has to Keep Opening Up series of events, including last weekend's in-

This year marks the 40th anniversary of the end of World War II and the 25th anniversary of the amendment of the Japan-U.S. security treaty. Reviewing Japan's diplomacy of the past 40 years, the 1985 diplomatic blue book refers to issues more outspokenly than before.

What is at first noteworthy is that the report strongly claims that Japan should sacrifice itself, to a certain extent, in order to make itself more socially, economically and psychologically open to the world. If foreign countries close their doors to Japan, the free trade system, which has sustained Japan's postwar economic prosperity, will be destroyed.

Of course, we have some say in the matter. But criticizing America's fiscal deficit and high interest rates, and Western Europe's rigid social and economic system, will be fruitless to Japan. There is no other way for Japan, which enjoys an annual current account surplus of $37 billion, but to open its market further. - The Daily Yomiuri (Tokyo).

Crusader in Central America

The June 19 attack in San Salvador in which six Americans were killed sends several messages to President Reagan. The "centrist" card represented by [President José Napoleón] Duarte may not be a winner. A "military solution achieves little, even when local armies are saturated with technology. Mr. Reagan's claims of victory in El Salvador may be premature, since tension can revive at any moment. And his Central America policy means a rising U.S. death toll. "North American soldiers have started dying in El Salvador," said the rebels' Radio Venceremos on June 21.

Lumping together the various crises of mid-June, Mr. Reagan called them attacks on Western civilization by ruthless, barbarians. Viewed from Central America, that looked like a clever way to spur on his crusade against what he sees as the forces of evil, with Managua as their local Mecca. To make the case, Mr. Reagan appeals more to emotion than to analysis, more to slogans than to facts and

Managua and Washington Are Playing With Fire

N EW YORK — "Yanqui Go Home" is again being painted on the walls in Latin America's cities. For democratic Latin Americans like myself, it is a nightmare — and we blame both the United States and Nicaragua for their intransigence and dogmatism.

The democratic superpower and the former banana republic are heading for a confrontation that could shake the entire hemisphere. Listen to Humberto Ortega Saavedra, Nicaraguan defense minister and brother of the president, declaring recently that if an invasion of Nicaragua took place, "Friends of the Nicaraguan people would begin a cam-paign of generalized violence against U.S. interests in Central America and elsewhere."

He went on: "While Sandinist forces resisted invading troops, pro-Sandinist forces and sympathizers throughout Latin America and in the United States would be active in various ways. A direct intervention by the United States would be very difficult to confine to our territory. It would logically have to extend itself to neighboring countries. Popular forces in Latin America will unleash their violence. The outcome will not be determined only by military power."

How have we reached this situation in which the defense minister of a tiny Third World country can threaten the strongest democracy? How does the Sandinist government dare to call hidden terrorists to arms?
And can the Sandinists really expect the democratic governments of Latin America to support them in their opposition to a U.S. intervention? In fact, Managua would in all probability get such support.
The nature and magnitude of these threats are clear for all to see — and extremely serious for the United States and the region as a whole. The Sandinist government has in effect incriminated itself, admitting that it may already have organized an international terrorist campaign against the United States. Beyond this, there is little question that the Nicaraguan government is moving toward greater repression and inflexibility.

It was, of course, not always thus. In the inning in the late 1970s, many democratic Latin American leaders - men like President

Omar Torrijos of Panama and President Carlos Andrés Pérez of Veneznela - strongly supported the Nicaraguan revolution. Along supported the Nicaraguan revolution. Along with some of the most prominent democratic leaders of Western Europe, they were encouraged by the Sandinists' promises and the seemingly broad base of the revolution. But they watched and waited as the months and then years passed and still the Sandinists failed to fulfill their promises. And by the end of this period of wait-and-see, the Sandinists had firmly entreproched themselves and weakhad firmly entrenched themselves and weakened all internal opposition.

There has been no lack of evidence. The Sandinists' intransigence was finally confirmed when they refused to allow the opposition leader, Arturo José Cruz, to participate in last November's national elections. It apparently did not matter to the Sandinists that they would probably have won the election anyway. Nor did it matter that leaders of the Socialist International struggled to obtain approval for his participation. The episode was a clear indication that the most radical of the Sandinists were in full control. But the United States is hardly free of blame for today's impasse. In part, its responsibility is historical: It was, after all, the United States that allowed the dictatorial regimes of the Somoza family to abuse Nica-raguan dignity for decades. Washington kept the Somozas in power until the bitter end. thus allowing the relatively radical Sandinist forces to triumph over the other groups participating in the revolution.

By Diego Arria

And U.S. responsibility continues today. It is no accident that the Sandinists, who represent themselves as David challenging Goliath, have been able to win the struggle for international public opinion. The near contempt that Washington has shown for the peace-making efforts of the Contadora countries (Mexico, Venezuela, Colombia and Panama) has contributed substantially to the further deterioration of the situation.

True, the Sandinists have shown little interest in creating a genuinely democratic state. But a negotiated settlement pushed by the Contadora group with the total support of the region could have made — and could still make - a significant difference in Nicaraguan politics. For one thing, it would have made it crystal clear that the other Latin American countries opposed the Sandinists' course. Nicaragua would have been exposed as a totalitarian state and would have none of the moral and political support it now enjoys. No one can seriously prove that Nicaragna is a threat to the security of the United States. If Nicaragua were invaded, Humberto Ortega's predictions would probably come true. Latin America would again become the center of anti-Americanism, arousing and inflaming violent forces just beneath the surface.

Latin Americans do not deserve this. Nor do the citizens of the United States, who could well experience violence on their own territory. Nicaragua does not have the right to blackmail our region with its threats; it does not have the right to involve us in an unending spiral of violence. Nor does President Reagan, leader of a great and democratic nation, have the right to blunder recklessly in Nicaragua. He does not have the right to ignore the Contadora group and the Organization of American States. Certainly, if Nicaragua is indeed a threat to U.S. security, then ashington should inform its natural allies - the Latin American countries - whose security would also be jeopardized.

Before it goes further, the Reagan administration should stop to consider what hap-pened to the hostile graffiti on our walls. If they disappeared for some years, it was not because they were painted over. They disappeared from walls and hearts thanks to the attitudes of more understanding U.S. admin-istrations and to the arduous efforts of those Latin Americans who struggled to establish democracy in our region.

President Reagan must not be allowed to undo those efforts. He must not be allowed to gamble away the future of Latin American democracy. That is the real "transcendent moral issue" in Latin America today.

WASHINGTON—The outcome of the Beirut hostage affair will be intensely debated in Iran. The perception of who won and who lost will influence not only future Iranian pol-icy in Lebanou but also the balance power between moderates and rad-

Tehran denies any link to the hijackers, but it has supported and funded the more radical Shiite groups in Lebanon. Its influence in the Bekaa is reinforced by a contingent of 500 revolutionary guards who arrived in 1982, with Syrian acquiescence, ostensibly to fight the Israelis. Last year, in what has since become known as Ayatollah Khomeini's "open window" foreign policy, he berated those critical of normalization of entities with Market Pierra. WASHINGTON — It is urgent to develop a more effective policy against terrorism. Americans in particular are increasingly the victims of this ugly phenomenon. From the hostages in transfive years ago to the property of the ization of relations with Western Europe. In May the Saudi foreign minister became the first ranking Sandi official to visit Iran since the revolution. There is an attempt to repair by such measures, until nearly every-one resumed business as usual. But America is under no obligation relations with the other Gulf states. Publicly, and at least in the Gulf region, Iranian officials are trying to to adhere to a multilateral suicide distance themselves from terrorist pact if international action is not forthcoming. Then it must act alone. In the final analysis, Americans character as a free people is being acts. Advocates of punishing states that support terrorism might note that the

came about as a result not of instant retaliation but of a slow squeeze— denial of arms, resupply of Iran's enemy, diplomatic isolation, mounting economic problems.

Nevertheless, some members of Iran's ruling coalition still believe in active export of revolution. The anti-American rhetoric remains intense. The government to a large degree is a prisoner of its revolutionary posture.
And Ayatollah Khomeini remains powerfully attracted by the possibility of seeing an Islamic government established in Baghdad. Even as the prospect of exporting revolution to-Gulf states has dimmed, Lebanon, with its large and dissatisfied Shifte community, has appeared a more attractive arena for Iranian efforts. During the hostage crisis, however, Iran maintained a low profile. It was Syria and its allies, not Iran and its" protégés, who called the shots. U.S. threats of retaliation have so far lacked conviction, but they do not go unheeded in Tehran. Moreover, Iran in Lebanon cannot stray far from Syrian policy. For Iran, the priority foreign policy issue is the war with Iraq, and in the prosecution of that war Syrian support is critical.

Thus, after some initial hesitation. the influential speaker of Iran's par-liament. Hashemi Rafsanjani an-nounced that while Iran sympathized with the grievances of the hijackers, it condemned the hijacking itself as an act of terrorism. Significantly, the announcement came while the speaker was in the Syrian capital.

This latest turn in Iran's zigzagging. foreign policy is in keeping with the more moderate line it has adopted in the Gulf region. This hardly means that Iran will cease supporting Lebe-non's radical Shiites, but it implies that Iran is having second thoughts about identifying itself with groups that employ terrorist tactics.

Iranian foreign policy, mirroring the internal divisions in the government, may continue to be character ized by an unstable mix of both radicalism and moderation. A clearer policy will emerge only when the de-bate between these factions is resolved. That, in turn, depends on whether Ayatollah Khomeini's men conclude, as they have in the case of the Gulf, that exporting revolution is an excessively costly enterprise.

Salisbury's Gothic Impossibility Struggles to Keep Its Head in the Clouds

by Rebecca Brite

ALISBURY, England — The Cathedral Church of the Blessed Virgin Mary at Salisbury is the great Gothic impossibility: By some lights, it impossibility: by should not still be standing.
Its foundations are unusually shallow. Its and spire — the tallest in Britain, soaring just over breathakingly graceful, soaring just over 400 feet with a lacey delicacy — are 6,400 of the church has been groaning under the strain for 700 years.

Now the intangibles of pollution and frost intesten to accomplish what sheer mass has never quite managed: If major restoration work is not done without delay, cathedral officials warn, the tower and spire could collapse before the end of this century.

Thus the lover of Gothic architecture who has somehow missed Salisbury Cathedral would be well-advised to visit before the year is out, for next spring scaffolding will go up that will obscure its perfect Early English profile for at least seven years. But Salisbury has many other attractions, which, with the historical and archaeological treasures of the counties of Wiltshire and nearby Hamp-shire, make it an ideal base for sightseeing in southern England.

On a billtop just outside the city of New Sarum, as Salisbury is still known in some official records, can be seen the foundations official records, can be seen the roundamous of Old Sarum, where the cathedral's predecessor and a sizable fortress stood. Quartels between the military and the ciergy, added to the windy hill town's lack of such amenities as water, led Bishop Richard Poore to relocate in 1219 to the neighboring river valley. The people of Sarum were not slow to see this site's advantages, and soon the hilltop was deserted. The foundation stones of the new cathedral were laid April 28, 1220. About a century later the old cathedral was used as a quarry for the walls of the Close, or cathedral precincts.

In 1258, in the presence of Henry III and the archbishop of Canterbury, the cathedral was consecrated. It was built of limestone from Chilmark, about 12 miles (19 kilometers) away, with columns of what is called Purbeck marble, not marble but limestone from the Isle of Purbeck, in Dorset, that takes a high shine.

Even today, 38 years could be considered a short time for the building of a major cathedral; witness the decades of work that have sone into St. John the Divine in New York. In the Middle Ages, 38 years for such a iron reinforcements had rusted. In addition, structure was just short of miraculous. It he reported, extensive work was needed on may be that the builders were helped by the discovery of a firm natural foundation only about four feet from the surface: a bed of flint gravel in a matrix of chalk. They built on this instead of having to dig foundations as much as 25 feet deep, as for most large

Because the work was finished so quickly, one of Salisbury Cathedral's chief characteristics is a uniformity of style unusual in a medieval cathedral. It is held to be the outstanding example of Early English Gothic.

A notable exception is the spire. It is in the later style known as Decorated. A vaguely worded document dated 1335 in the catheworded document dated 1335 in the cathedral's scanty archives from this period long led the experts to assume that the tower and spire were added as much as century after the main building was finished. Now it is believed that the project was more or less continuous, with work starting on the spire in perhaps the 1260s or 70s, when the cloisters and chapter house were being built in Geometrical Decorated style.

Whatever the date of this work, it is almost whatever the date of this work, it is almost certain that Salisbury Cathedral's crowning touch was not part of the anonymous original builder's plan. The clerk of the works at the cathedral, Roy Spring, pointed out the lack of records and said the truth would probably never be known, but the architectural evidence indicates that the building was decigned to be torough only by a sound. was designed to be topped only by a squat, square cupola, or lantern.

Adding a tower and spire instead caused immediate structural problems, the result of which can be seen most dramatically by looking directly up from one of the four columns inside that bear most of the tower's weight: The great columns, with their decorative Purbeck marble shafts, are noticeably

There are so-called strainer arches, including upside-down arches, at the entrances to the transcepts to diffuse the effects of the spire's weight. Through the centuries, archi-tects from Sir Christopher Wren to Sir George Gilbert Scott, designer of the Albert Memorial, have advised on ways to shore up the spire and ease the strain on the building below. In the latest work, the top 23 feet of the spire was restored in 1949-51 and the tower reinforced in 1967-69.

Spring, in a study completed in 1975, found that the stone, weakened by weathering but above all by acid rain and other air pollution, was crumbling away below the level of the 1951 work and that 18th-century the west front, the decorative facade added to the building shortly after the main con-struction was finished.

The dean and chapter of the cathedral are trying to raise £6.5 million (about $8.5 million) for the project. Prince Charles, nominal president of the spire appeal, landed his scarlet helicopter in the Cathedral Close to attend a launching ceremony in April. Since then, just under £200,000 has been raised.

"Pollutants from cars have been the worst culprits" in the deterioration, Spring said, but he noted that the upper end of the spire, because of its height, is often in cloud and mist, which contributes to the weakening of

Cathedral officials are considering run-ning limited (and expensive) specialist tours of the work in progress once the scaffolding

HE interior will still be well worth seeing. Among its chief points of interest are the oldest working clock in Britain, a Rube Goldberg-like contraption dating from about 1386; one of four surviving 1215 copies of the Magna Carta; the carvings in the Chapter House, including an exic-looking triple-faced head and an Old Testament frieze that is a study in 13th-cartary clothing, customs, tools and transport; and the modern. French-made "Prisport; and the modern, French-made "Pris-oners of Conscience" window at the east

At the west end of the north aisle is perhaps the most curious of many unusual gravestones and monuments in the church: a miniature effigy of a bishop, popularly sup-posed to represent a "boy bishop"; during the Middle Ages, one of the cathedral choris-ters would be elected to act as bishop for most of December. The effigy, however, may instead have covered the heart of the cathedral's founder, Bishop Poore.

There are still boy choristers, the 16 trebles of one of the top cathedral choirs in Britain. A choral service in Salisbury Cathedral is enough to convince one that women should not be allowed to sing soprano, but the purity of the sound is not only one to the quality of these boys' voices: The cathedral is blessed, mostly by accident, with beautiful acoustics. Richard Seal, organist and choirmaster, attributed this to the unblocked entrance of the choir transept and the straight lines of the building's simple cruciform plan.

This year it is Salisbury's turn to host the Southern Cathedrais Festival, July 25-28, so one may also hear two other top choirs, those of Chichester and Winchester, taking advanage of the acoustics here.

When all is sung and done inside, how er, it is the exterior of the cathedral, the views that entranced the painters John Constable and J.M.W. Turner, and the setting glory; and these are essentially 18th-century work, not 13th. They are owed to the architect James Wyatt, who in 1789-1792 stripped away such impedimenta (he felt) as a detached bell tower, two chapels at the east end and a crowd of churchyard gravestones.

The reaction was very much akin to the mix of outrage and admiration that greeted Viollet-le-Duc's work on Notre Dame in Paris. But the result is the now-famous unencumbered outline of the building, set amid an expanse of the seemingly never-fading grass that makes so much of southern England resemble a well-tended golf green.

Virtually every building in the Cathedral Close has a story, from the literary (Hardy used the King's House, now home to a good miscum, in "Jude the Obscure"; Fielding lived next to St. Ami's Gate) to the musical (Handel is supposed to have given his first concert in England in the room over St. Ann's Gate) and artistic sporting poetic (Constable stayed in Walton Canonry, named after the angler Izaak Walton, father of a cathedral canon and friend of George Herbert, who lived nearby).

Outside the walls of the close — the gates are still locked every night — is a medieval city whose streets, thanks to Bishop Poore, are laid out in a grid pattern rarely found in Europe. In the middle of it is, has always Continued on page 8

The Art Boom Sets Off A Museum Building Spree

by Grace Glueck

EW YORK - There can be no doubt that the tourist and retirement center of Fort Landerdale, Florida, has arrived as a metropolis. Next January, in line with the tried-andtrue American belief that you can't have a city without an art institution, it will open a $7.5-million Museum of Art, designed by one of the country's most sought-after cultural edificers, Edward Larrabee Barnes

Meanwhile, across the country in fast-growing San Jose, California, the capital of Silicon Valley, an $8-million to $10-million addition is planned for the local art museum, along with a brandnew, $60-million center for science and technology.

The growth of both these museums, focused largely on contemporary art, reflects demographic shifts. In Fort Landerdale, the change is from a transient resort population to a "self-sofficient" community where people live year-round — making up what, in advertising parlance, is known as "Florida's most affluent market." The influx of high-technology workers has helped raise San Jose to the status of 14th-largest city in the United States. But the two museums are also part of a larger phenomenon, a growth in art facilities across the country that makes the building space of the 1970s, once thought to have abated, look like a practice run.

Spurred by the enlarging public appetite for art, the rate at which it is being produced and acquired, and a growing perception of the museum as a community center, dozens of institutions, from New York to Los Angeles, from Seattle to Portland, Maine, are projecting, constructing or celebrating the completion of new quarters, and renovating old ones.

N Manhattan, all four major art museums are involved with significant expansion programs. The Museum of Modern Art opened its renovated building doubling its gallery space, last year. The Metropolitan is readying its 90,000-square-foot Southwest Wing, devoted to 20th-century art, for opening in January 1987. The Whitney Museum of American Art has announced plans for a 10story addition that will more than double its space, and the Guggenstory animount that will half an 11-story addition for gallery, storage and office areas. While it is true that the concern of all these projects is 20th-century art, the largest "growth area" in the museum trade, institutions with other kinds of collections are also expanding.

New museum buildings have opened within the last few years in Dallas, Atlanta, Miami, San Antonio, Portland and Anchorage, among other cities. Expansion projects have been carried out at the Museum of Fine Arts in Boston, the Baltimore Museum of Art, the Akron Art Museum and the Walker Art Center in Minneapolis.

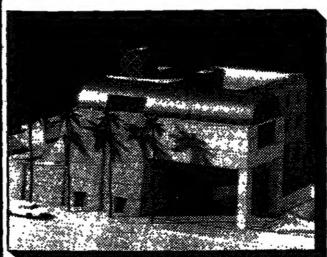

Additions to the Virginia Museum of Fine Arts in Richmond, the Hood Museum at Dartmouth College in Hanover, New Hampshire, and the Arnot Art Museum in Elmira, New York, will be unveiled

In prospect are new or expanded quarters for the Los Angeles Museum of Contemporary Art, the Art Institute of Chicago, the Seattle Art Museum, the Getty Museum in Malibu, California, the Museum of African Art in Washington, the Sheldon Memorial Art Gallery at the University of Nebraska, the Museum of American Folk Art in New York and the Vassar College Art Gallery in Poughkeepsie, New York. This is only a partial list.

Since the 19th century, of course, the public consensus has been that art museums are very good creatures to have around. Along with opera houses and concert halls, they are a basic amenty of metropoltran life. But today they are everywhere; in cities, yes, but also on campuses, in small towns, suburban areas, and far-flung rural outposts. They are established not only by public, but private interests; more than several, including the Norton Simon Museum in Pasadena, California, the Terra Museum in Evanston, Illinois, are devoted to the holdings of one collector.

The museum derby goes on, a continuous race to put up no buildings and enlarge the old ones.

"We have a very compelling reason," says Thomas Messer, director of the Guggenbeim, "a collection of 6,000 objects of which no more than 300 are on view. We're not shooting for showing the whole collection, but 5 percent is too little if you have masterpieces in

Plans for expanded Museum of Contemporary Art in Los Angeles.

Portland Museum of Art.

Yet, professionals in the field ask questions. Are museums paying too much attention to building, at the expense of what should be their primary concerns — the acquisition and conservation of high-quality objects, the pursuit of scholarship and the presentation of exhibitions? Are they in competition with each other for the same kinds of art? Will a number of them, after the glamour is over, hold out his cups for support to the same all-too-finite funding sources?

And are all the new museums really needed?

A basic reason for the unparalleled growth is that art itself, no longer considered an esoteric or avant-garde discipline, has entered the mainstream of American life. Thanks to educational efforts on the part of schools and museums themselves, as well as widespread attention from the media, today's general public is better informed attention from the media, today's general public is better informed about art than any preceding it.

"In the last 10 years, our membership has risen from 3,500 to 18,500," says Henry Hopkins, director of the San Francisco Museum of Modern Art, now celebrating its 50th anniversary.

Another factor in their growth is that museums, now advised like corporations by fast-stepping advertising and public-relations firms, have become very good at marketing and "development," telling the public host escential they are And to autract that public they create. public how essential they are. And to attract that public, they create blockbuster shows (or mega-exhibitions, as Philippe de Montebello, director of the Metropolitan, would have it) and other divertissements that are not always of great aesthetic or scholarly merit.

Also, many museums are being built in response to the dizzying success of contemporary art. There is no doubt that more artists to the contemporary art. There is no doubt that more artists to the contemporary art. There is no doubt that more artists to the contemporary art.

today are turning out more art than ever before in history — some observers, in fact, accuse them of making it especially for museums. And thanks to tax laws that favor donations, many collectors are also giving works to museums, in some cases gifts that ought to be refused. As more and more art lovers collect the work — often with the help of museum curators — then donate it, museums expand.

A factor not to be overlooked is civic ambition. To attract desirable private citizens, corporations and tourists, forward-looking municipalities today realize they have to provide more than water, electric and sewage services while keeping taxes low.

By 1978, it was obvious that the Fort Landerdale museum had outgrown its storefront quarters of 15,000 square feet, and an acre of land was acquired in a downtown redevelopment area. In 1984, with two-thirds of the $7.5 million cost raised from business and community sources, construction was begun on the 64,000-square-foot facility, which will have a sculpture terrace and an outdoor restau-Why a museum in a city only one-half hour's drive from Miami, which has several art institutions? The largest and newest, the Philip Johnson-designed Center for the Fine Arts, is an exhibition hall that does not collect. "We felt that nothing significant was happening there," says Elliott Barnett, a local lawyer and collector who is the prime mover of the enterprise, pointing out that none of the Miami facilities is devoted to contemporary art. In that way, the museum builds a bond with the community. Aware that the fledgling institution has nowhere to go but up in terms of its holdings, Barnett says, "We won't try to be more than we can be. We're not the Met or the Art Institute of Chicago. But we want to do it right for our scale. Fifty years from now, there's an even chance that we will have built the kind of collection of which our children and grandchildren will be proud."

UT other professionals confess to mixed feelings about the socalled "museum explosion." One concern they voice is whether museums are putting enlargement of their facilities before more serious priorities. "I can't help but identify this need for expansion with the male corporate ego, which sees that the way to keep people interested is to do bigger or more," says Linda Cathcart, director of the non-collecting Museum of Contemporary Art in

But I think better is the only way museums can go. First you should acquire the art, then build your buildings. If you need another wing for your great stuff, O.K. But wings for not-so-hot collections and poor scholarship?"

One thing seems certain - the huge audience for museums will continue to encourage their expansion, whatever scholarly or aesthetic limitations that may impose on them. In terms of bricks and mortar, at least, they are a howling success.

Keeping Alive the Vanishing Métier of Sheepherding

by Nell Platt

Salisbury Cathedral.

N Saumane, a village in the back hills of Provence, a retired lavender farmer is looking for something to do. His mid-dle-aged son decides to help out: He will make his father responsible for the family's small herd of sheep. It seems a perfect arrangement. Since it is difficult to find a shepherd willing to work without pay today, the family will save money. The old man will feel useful, everyone will be happy.

Soon afterward the family notices that the sheep aren't as healthy as they once were. In fact, they've gotten scrawny. The old man, it appears, never lets the animals get enough to eat. Eager to prove himself a fit, if elderly shepherd, he strides round the mountain all day long with the sheep at his heels, rarely letting them stop to graze,

The family gave the grandfather a good talking to, and the ewes soon fattened up again. Still the family worries about how they will manage when the old man becomes too old to tend the flock. They cannot afford a professional shepherd, and it would take more grassland than the family owns to put the flock into enclosed pasture.

In the rocky Luberon mountain range east of Avignon, a young sheep farmer's ambi-tions create a stir. Aided with subsidies from the French Ministry of Agriculture, Gilles Antonovich becomes the first farmer in the Luberon to put his flock into enclosed pasture. His experiment with electric fences makes shock waves in the countryside.

"We've come to accept them," says one

"Because once the fence is installed." points out another, "you don't have to pay a monthly salary."

Sheep farming is big business in France.

With 13 million head of sheep, mostly in the Massif Central and the Midi, France supplies 39 percent of the European Community's mutton and lamb. Although France can-not compete with Australia and New Zealand in the world wool market, sheep's milk is an important commodity here - it is the principal ingredient of one of France's most exported cheeses, Roquefort.

N Provence, as elsewhere in France, the sheep industry has evolved quickly in the last several years, as changing market demands and agricultural theories have had their effect on this Mediterranean re-

Yet there is one aspect of sheep farming in Provence that has not changed with the rest of France, and is not likely to without controversy: for Provence remains one of the last places in the industrialized world where the metier of shepherd still exists.

Although their numbers have dwindled since World War II, shepherds are still quite visible in the southeastern corner of France: an old man whose flock grazes in the grassy circle of an autorome exit near Marseille; a college student and his Walkman with a thousand sheep in the Alps; a former nun; a laid-off factory worker; a distillusioned neighbor, "But still, it doesn't make sense. In two thousand years nobody's had fences around here; why should we start now?"

modern sheep farming, the electric fence.
"In France, any discussion of sheep farming begins with one essential problem," explains Gilbert Molenat, director of Le Mede, an agricultural college near Arles that specializes in training shepherds.

"That problem is available space. In the vast range lands of Australia and western North America — and in less and, less mountainous parts of France - the need for shepherds disappeared long ago. You don't have to find someone to mind your sheep of you can build a big enough fence.

"In Provence, fences are impractical. Although this region remains essentially rural, land here is parceled off into small, centuries-old farms. Few sheep farmers own enough rangeland to fence in their flocks. Some don't own any land at all.

"Most Provençal sheep farmers feed their flocks by renting the right to graze on uncultivated land from local landowners. These semi-nomadic sheep farmers, called bergers herbaciers (grass shepherds), move their flocks from property to property from early fall through the spring, then migrate to the applicants for the job.

Yet if Provence still has a need for shep-

"Thirty years ago," explains Gilbert Mo-lenst, "every village had its shepherd. The job was simple, but tedious: seeing that the animals got enough to eat, without eating up people's crops and gardens. Sometimes old men were shepherds, sometimes small children. Often the job would fall to that person who used to be called the village idiot.

"As you might imagine, the great demographic shift that France has undergone since World War II has had its effect on the sheep industry. The rural population has grown smaller and smaller and the daily life of those still living on farms has changed. In short, most of those who traditionally worked as shepherds are simply no longer available for the job."

T the same time, a new breed of wouldbe shepherds has appeared in the past La few years: most of them town and city dwellers who feel themselves called to the pastoral life.

"Twenty years ago," says Molenat, "Our problem lay in figuring out how it would be possible to keep the shepherd's way of life from dying out

"One solution has been to draw upon the wealth of those who do not come from traditional sheep farming families, but who would like to give the shepherd's life a try. That is, to create a sort of school for shepherds, now that the metier is no longer being handed down from father to son," Le Merle has existed toward that end since

18th-century farm on the road from Aix-en-Provence to Arles every year — although the school turns down several times that many Students spend one year at Le Merle. "The modern shepherd's job includes more than simply watching sheep," says Molenat. "He or she must know everything that the owner of the herd has traditionally had to know, and then some.

"Many students come here with the hope of one day owning their own flock, having first worked for some time on the payroll of one of the larger sheep farms in the region. Thus they have to know everything about the practical, theoretical and economic aspects of the business: herding, breeding, mid-wi-fery, veterinary medicine, ovine anatomy, as well as bookkeeping and accounting. The highlight of Le Merle's yearlong course of study is the transhumance (from the latin trans humus, "across the earth"), the annual migration of the flocks from lower Provence to the Alps. Each student shepherd, having spent nine months at Le Merle, accompanies a flock of sheep to their high summer pasture, then spends three months alone there with them.

"Until World War II, the transhumance was done on foot," explains Molenat. "It took three weeks for the shepherds to get their flocks to high pasture, and three weeks to get them back. Today, the sheep are transported to the Alps by truck. "The transhumance makes or breaks a shepherd. Any romantic ideas he might have about the profession are quickly dispelled by the extreme isolation of the summer pasture. It may be beautiful up there, but three months with nothing but a thousand sheep for company can be trying."

of study are awarded a diploma, important, for any sheep farmer wanting to obtain agricultural loans from France's nationalized farm bank Crédit Agricole. Who becomes a shepherd today?

"The 'back-to-the-earth' wave of the 1960s and '70s has pretty much abated now," says Molenat. "We have fewer applicants than we did a decade ago, although they may be more realistic about what they're getting into than some of our students were in 1970. Some are people who have lost their jobs in the economic crisis and are seeking a new metier; some are children of sheep farmers who plan to take over the family farm one day, and want the financial credibility that a diploma will help bring them."

LTHOUGH many people are still interested in becoming shepherds, there is a rather high dropout rate. Of the 20 shepherds that graduate from Le Merle every year, says Molenat, only about half are still at it five years later.

"Even a very good shepherd does not always last long: As long as a young shep-herd is unmarried, he or she doesn't much mind the nomadic life. Once children start arriving, though, those summer months at 3,000 meters altitude look a little different."

That is not the only problem with shepherds," says François Demarquet, director of Carmajane, a sheep husbandry school near Digne that encourages the use of fences in Provence. The cost of hiring a shepherd these days is enough to do in many small

He remembers countless celebrities, especially late Chilean president Salvador Allende and the former Mexican president Luis Echeverria. But above all he remembers the many writers and journalists that made the Bodeguita famous. "I made it little. You journalists made it big," he says.

O one did more to make the Bode-guita and the Floridia big than Hemingway. Antonio Meilan, 59, remembers him coming to the bar every evening when he was in Cuba. He always ordered his daiquiri double and without sugar. The drink is still known at the Floridita as a "Papa," Meilan remembers the writer as "kind and affectionate," but he says he rarely ate in the elegant round dining room adjacent to the bar, which is known for lobster specialties. "He only drank here,"

A better celebrity endorsement for the Bodeguita comes from actor Errol Flyan, who also came more than once and had his picture taken. "Best place to get drunk," he said. And while whole poems have been written about the Bodeguita, no one ever said it better.

Often, a travel agent can cut the waiting time to a formight or less, but there will be handling fees.

There is another solution. Most Soviet-

At either address, you must leave your passport, two photos, and 190 schillings (about $9). You may collect the visa two working days later — though a travel agent or a personal plea can usually win it overnight. Yugoslavia requires visas of Americans, but not Europeans. While obtainable at border crossings, occasionally with some diffi-culty, a Yugoslav visa can be had in 20 minutes for 93 schillings at Salmgasse AA in Vienna, just across the Landstrasser Hampt strasse from the Sunnhof, a brand-new lood and shopping complex built in the Bieder-meier style of the Metternich era.

There is no particular advantage in applying for Soviet or East German visas in Vitana. Both require vouchers proving that you have prepaid your hotel stays to an authorized travel agent, who might as well arrange the visas too. In Vienna, this will take 10 days for the Soviet Union, three or four days for East Germany. But visas for the latter than th can also be obtained at border crossing upon presentation of hotel vouchers, according to the travel office of the German Denocratic Republic at Brandstätte 4, in the shadow of St. Stephan's Cathedral. This information office will direct you to authorized agents, as will Intourist, the Soviet agency, at Schwedenplatz 3.

The Albanian Embassy at Jacquingase
41, on the border of Belvedere's botanical gardens, does not welcome inquiries about individual tourism.

One last admonition for visa applicants When filling out forms in longhand, he say to put a horizontal slash through the number 7, as most Europeans do; otherwise, it may be read as a 1. This is particularly pertinent to the standard visa question about "length of stay in days." Not long ago, a Central Park West marron arrived in Prague for what she thought was a week's visit, only to be told she was there for an overnight stay. It took her a morning at the police station and a tip to the bank to prolong her visa by six days.

long commercial tradition, many of the most picturesque allow one to combine architectural rubbernecking with shopping eating and drinking. The oldest known house in the city, John a Porte's in Queen Street, is home to Watsons, fine glassware and china; just outside the High Street gate of the close is the warrenlike Beech's antiquarian bookshop; across from St. Ann's gate is the Old Bell Inn, in a 14th-century grammar school, another pub, the Pheasant, occupies the 15th-century hall of the Shoemakers' Guild in Salt Lane.

St. Edmund's Church, with its Cromwellian tower, is now the Salisbury Arts Centre, and among the city's more modern buildings is Salisbury Playhouse. Both figure largely in the annual Salisbury Festival, Sept. 7-21 this year. Featured artists will include the Academy of St. Martin in the Fields, the London

Wiltshire is unusually rich in archaeological sites. The top ones include Stonehenge, accessible despite recent angry invasions by what the English, quaintly, still call hippies; the Avebury henge monument, which dwarfs Stonehenge but looks less impressive because of the village built amid and around it; Silbury Hill, the largest artificial prehistoric mound in Europe, whose purpose has never been discovered; the nearby West Kenner Long Barrow, a large chambered tomb that was being used as a burial place when the Egyptians were still figuring out how to cut stone; and the Westbury White Horse of 1778, most spectacular of the many monumental figures carved into Wiltshire's chalk hillsides. Nissan Unscrambles Teeming Tokyo With New, Fact-Packed Guidebook For Visitors

TOKYO: This sprawling metropolis of 12 million scurrying inhabitants is, without question, the world's most preplexing capital. Streets run in rings around the imperial palace. Building numbers are erratic and if a visitor doesn't read or speak Japanese, hopes of asking mderstandable directions or deciphering road signs are nil.

But new belp is at hand: the just-published, distinctively orange-covered 132 page NISSAN GUIDE TO TOKYO AND ENVIRONS.

A lucidly written, fact-packed English language compendium of every significant place, leature, address and telephone number that visiting tourists or executives need at their lingertips to take all the confusion out of a Tokyo tour.

Nissan, like the other giants in the automotive field, Michelin and Shell, has now gone into the guidebook business with a remarkable, and impressive paperback which fits soughy and conveniently in a pocket, attache case or pocketbook. Illustrating the well-written, thoroughly researched text are 25 easy-to-decipher street maps of various Tokyo locations. Little space has been wasted on pretty pictures; this is an informative hard-working guidebook for people in a hurry who badly need swift help.

The giant Japanese automotive firm obviously spared no expense in producing this detail-crammed book. Expert foreign correspondents from the U.S.A., U.K. and Switzerland, based in Tokyo and knowledgeable about the city, from its broad boulevards to its teeming back alleys, were hired to write the guide, and their insights give the volume an extra dimension not found in the usual tourist guide to monuments

They drop in such interesting tidhits as: Thursday is the only day of the week that the Horyuji treasures are on open display in Tokyo's national museum; or that 6.00 a.m. is auction time at the Teukiji Fish Market when the best tuna are put on the block to be snapped up by the

by Roger Collis

FORTNIGHT ago, two air transport initiatives nudged Europe a bit further toward some form of deregulation. First was an agreement on a more liberal fare-setting policy by 20 of the 22 member states of the European Civil Aviation Conference (ECAC) at its triennial session in Strasbourg. Second was an an-nomnoament by the British and Dutch govemments to extend the liberal bilateral agreement, signed in June 1984, into what amounts to an "open skies" regime between the two countries. While these initiatives are vastly different in scope and application, they are both likely to have a far-reaching effect on the liberalization of fares and entry of carriers into air routes.

Not that anyone seriously expects to see the unleashing of U.S.-style free market forces across the whole of Europe; there are protectionist countries like Italy and France to contend with. The most likely multilateral consensus is what Eurocrats, with an ineffa-ble sense of Realpolitik, call "regulated com-petition," which is what ECAC is working painstakingly toward.

Reform may also emerge from the cumulative effect of the EC deregulation formula, Memorandum 2, currently stuck in high-level working groups; antitrust noises from the EC Commission, and a growing consumer lobby. But perhaps the most potent catalyst will be the example of the recent British bilateral agreements with the Netherlands, West Germany and Luxembourg - a liberal comer of Europe — which may have a domi-no effect in neighboring states.

Given that it is hard to get Europeans to agree about anything more contentious than motherhood and apple pie (although even this could run foul of the common agriculmarkable achievement. Although it virtually condones revenue and capacity pooling car-tels and only meekly calls for the multiple designation of carriers on a competidesignation of carriers on a country-pair and tion, it does contain an important proposal for "fare zones" that would fix maximum and minimum prices on air rontes and leave the airlines to fight it out within those terms.

The idea for fare zones was first mooted by an ECAC task force and presented in the -so-called COMPAS report at the previous triennial session in 1982. The EC drew upon this report for its more detailed fare zone proposals in Memorandum 2, published in February 1984. However, according to John Crayston, deputy secretary of ECAC, the EC Crayston, deputy secretary of ECAC, the EC document was simply an attempt by the Commission to persuade member governments to adopt more liberal policies ("So far it hasn't worked, and only bits of it may eventually work."), whereas the ECAC policy statement, although not going as far as Memorandum 2, is a "moral commitment" by a larger number of governments to "get on and do something to develop a more flexible system." flexible system."

A new ECAC task force will have its first meeting on July 9 to start hammering out ultimate outcome will be a formal interna-tional agreement that will overlay and re-place parts of the web of bilateral agree-ments between the ECAC member states. "But we should imagine that this will be limited to fares," he says.

Fare zones, or "zones of freedom," were introduced on the North Atlantic three years ago as a compromise between the U.S. and European governments following the Civil Aeronautics Board's show-cause order threatening airlines with antitrust action if they continued their fare-fixing activities. This was the U.S.-ECAC "Memorandum of Understanding" which has led to the partial deregulation of trans-Atlantic flights and dramatically lower fares.

Whether or not the application of fare zones in Europe will bring about a reduction in fares will depend not only on how they are applied (how wide the zones are on either side of the "reference" fare and whether they apply to each type of fare), but how flexible are the bilateral agreements under which they function. There are three elements that define the regulatory system: fares, capacity and market entry. Restrict any two of these and no amount of flexibility on the third will change things very much. For example, if there are only two carriers on a route, splitting the revenue and capacity under a cory pooling arrangement, there is no incentive to use the flexibility of zones. But bring in a third, or fourth carrier, as is typical on North Atlantic routes and you introduce a real element of competition related to price and quality of service,

Fare zones are one way to get protectionist governments to accept some form of liberal-ization. But paradoxically, they can hinder rather than help the movement toward deregulation. This is because they invite more government involvement rather than less and perpensate the traditional form of bilateral agreement which works on a "double approval" system, whereby no fare can be marketed unless both sides agree. This has made it easy for governments to protect their inefficient state-owned airlines from real

The British and Dutch took a giant step toward liberalization with their bilateral agreement a year ago. This set a precedent in Europe for "country of origin" rules, which means that each side can set its own fares without approval from the other. The agreement abolished pooling, allowed free access to any Dutch or British airline on any route. between the two countries and to mount as much capacity as they want. But the most semmal feature was to allow carriers "sixth freedom" selling rights between Britain, the Netherlands and any other country. This enables a traveler to buy a KLM ticket in, say, Glasgow, and fly via Amsterdam to the Far East without passing through London. The Netherlands, being a small, strategically placed country with an efficient sirline, has more to gain from such an arrangement than Britain, which stands to lose traffic. Insiders say that Britain agreed to sixth freedom as a trade for more liberal fares.

According to a report by the British and Dutch at the ECAC meeting in Strasbourg the first nine months of this liberal regime have had spectacular results. Traffic be-tween London and Amsterdam from July 1984 to March 1985 increased by 16 percent on the same period a year before. This was 6 percent higher than traffic between the two cities and other points in Europe. Ten new services have been introduced, six of these involving new city pairs, the others providing more competition on existing routes Four new services have just been designated, 19 license applications are in the pipeline and 11 different airlines are now flying scheduled services between the two coun-

Competition has forced down many fares and eased some of the restrictions attached to others. For example, British Caledonian has a relatively unrestricted £49 (about $64) return fare between Gatwick and Schipho and has introduced an innovative system of "time flyer" fares, which depend on the time of day you fly. Round trips can vary between £109 at morning peak time to £69 in the middle of the day. Restrictions are advance booking and a minimum of one pickers. booking and a minimum of one night's stay. According to market research, airlines on the London-Amsterdam route are now carrying the annual equivalent of more than 70,000 passengers who would not have gone by air but for the new low fares.

The Anglo-Dutch agreement has now been further liberalized to allow ardines to combine services to more than one point in the other country, or to link such services with a second point in another European country. The "country of origin" rule has been replaced by "double disapproval." This means that airlines can set whatever fares they like. Only it both governments disapprove can they be thwared.

Once free market forces like this are unleashed, they may be hard to stop.

A Haven in Devon for the Compleat Angler

by George Gudanskas

IFTON, England — Two appeared at first, then four, then a dozen or more. They didn't tell us about the cows," one fly fisher remarked to another as they assessed their plight, friendly but undeniably huge animals between them and their fishing trail. "How do you get cows away from a gate?"

No amount of shooing would do, nor would other threatening gestures. Through the brush and over a rangled barbed-wire fence seemed the only way around

Asked later over a friendly drink, the same question never really was answered. Offered instead was cheerful advice.

"You've got to be careful they don't break your rod," one beefy English fisherman said. "What about my feet!" retorted the visiting angler.

In the bar of the Arundell Arms, fishers, men and women alike, offer lots of advice. And tell tall stories, too. It's part of a day at this im, a premier fishing hotel that has been catering to anglers for more than 50 years.

Here, everything a traveling fisherman needs is taken care of by hotel staff; licensing, maps, guides, lessons and gear. Packed lunches are available, too, as are diversions for those not interested in fishing.

Situated in this village in west Devon, about 38 miles from Exeter, the three-century-old imn owns fishing rights on 20 miles of water on five wild rivers. Four of them rise on Dartmoor, the vast, mist-shrouded moor-beron takes flight and a salmon leaps. Near the hotel, the four rivers blend into the Tamar, the frontier river dividing Devon and Comwall.

The Tamar is known for its salmon fishing, said to be the best in the region. Fish average 10 pounds. Occasionally, one goes to 20, and catching one is a sport for the passionate. A hooked salmon is a leaping fighter, and rarely is one hooked.

Brown trout abound in these waters, too, shy but nicely marked fish that take a dry fly with a slash and splash that fishers expect only of native fish.

Night fishing can be had by those cautious scekers of the clusive sea tront, a spooky creature known locally as peal. These searun brown trout run about two to three

The hotel also owns a nearby lake, actually an old limestone quarry that flooded in Victorian times. Spring-fed, it is a haven for rainbow trout running to seven pounds or more. Tinhay Lake yields almost all the hefty fish taken here on a fly, often with the type known as drifted nymph. type known as drifted nymph.

In season, you can hike, watch birds, golf, hmnt, ride, shoot snipe, and even fish for sharks along the coast. Antique shops and historic sights are nearby, but, unlike some parts of England, it can be 20 miles between pubs.

Anne Voss-Bark has been proprietor since 1961, when she acquired the inn with her first husband, Gerald Fox-Edwards. They wanted to leave behind the pressures of the advertising business in London and allow him to rest for his health.

Fox-Edwards died in 1972, and she later married Conrad Voss-Bark, a British jour-nalist who now lectures in the hotel's fishing

Plenty of fishing talk goes on, too, especially at dusk, during cocktail hour before dinner. Dining at the restaurant is no casual thing: jacket and tie for men and dress for women, though you can get away with less.

For weekly guests, seating is at the same

The sawdust fighting ring now holds fishing rods instead of spurred bantams. Fishing gear also is on show for purchase, rent, or just admiration. Two knowledgeable instructors teach fish-about fly fishing. "It's a kind of conjuring trick." he tells students, "to make the trout realize that a bit a fluff on a hook is a delicious thing to eat." Enough of them — thousands over the years — learn the basic skills of angling to be able to catch fish, which is what most guests at the hotel prefer to do. On average, hotel literature states, they bring in about 100 salmon, 400 sea trout and 1,200 brown trout each year.

At the end of a fishing day, the fish are weighed and displayed in the corner of the sitting room. Here, too, fishing beats are booked daily, each angler inspecting another's catch, and signing up accordingly. No beat can be booked for more than one day straight, and competition is keen for certain

The fish are taken away just before dinner, but not until cocktail hour is almost over, to be prepared for a meal or frozen to take home. A fresh-caught trout is a tempting meal, and the Arundell Arms has the chef to do the job - Devon-born Philip Burgess trained in Switzerland and France and worked in London before returning home five years ago.

His cuisine is based on locally raised meat and vegetables, with sauces made to "en-hance and compliment the natural flavor of the main ingredient," he says. A good wine list backs up his dishes. After dinner, drinks can be taken in the lounge, where the slate floors date back 300 years and a huge fireplace is ablaze when it's chilly.

Talk there usually turns to fishing, of course, and occasionally to a persistent ques-tion, like how to get the cows away from the Within months of the first world war ending the Royal Tournament was back in London's entertainment calendar and the Royal Air Force flew in for the first time.

By 1933, with war clouds once again looming, motor cycles and other motorised units began to appear side by side with the horse.

After the war, because the numbers who wanted tickets for performances had soared, the event was moved in 1950 to its present home at Earls Court in West London. The larger arena meant that instead of the then King's Troop, Royal Horse Artillery, trotting into the arena they could enter at a gallop and go into live action to demonstrate the skills involved in firing a royal salute.

In 1955, the year of the Queen's coronation, the tournament went international with units from Commonwealth countries being invited, and in 1979 a youth band from the United States entertained the crowd.

Another glamorous event of different kind opens in London in a few days. It is an exhibition of glorious jewellery and boutique items at the Van Cleef & Arpels shop at 159 New Bond Street. The pieces are being flown to London from the Paris salon as an added attraction for the thousands in London for the American Bar Association conference. This display of sparkling brilliance fits naturally into the London scene where the emphasis is always on tradition. It will be on parade from July 10-25.

There is a different kind of tradition, this time on water, at the Royal Regatta at Henplace from July 4/7. The first occasion was nearly 150 years ago in 1839. Prince Albert, consort to Queen Victoria, gave the event his patronage in 1855 and since then it has been the Henley Royal Regatta.

One competition has been continuous since the first year. This is the Grand Challenge Cup for amateur eights. The world's finest crews from all parts to try to win one of rowing's most covered troby Moss Murray phies. But there is more to Henley than rowing.

The town itself is worth exploring, especially the historic Henley Bridge, built in 1512. Search out as well the old coaching inns. Once there were as many as 70. Don't miss the most famous, the Red Lion Hotel, which dates back to 1632. Charles I stayed there many times, and for several years it was used as a half way house to Blenheim Palace by the Dukes of Marlerected and many clubs and companies hire them to entertain guests. About 20,000 are expected on the final Saturdignified and serious occasion. In fact, it is a lot of fun. Getting there need not be a problem. You can either drive

Leecomputer Future May Already Be Past

BY ERIK SANDBERG-DIMENT New York Times Service

EW YORK — Technologies and sciences have a teadency to merge: Physics and chemistry ooze into metallurgy, plastics and the other material sciences. Genetic engineering bubbles up from the cauldron into which biology, physics and chemistry have been stirred. And in one way or another just about every scientific branch is absorbed Attempts are even being made to incorporate genetics into microelectronics, in hopes of producing self-replicating biochips. These intriguing little grow-your-own digital computing devices show great promise, if not feasibility before the 21st century.

More immediately we have the entwinement of computer science and telephonics in the endeavor with the horrid name of the possible and the probable often Compaq's latest announcement in this realm, the Teledo not coincide. compaq, strives for a little more eachet with the description of itself as a "telecomputer." At the moment that designation seems the least offensive. The Telecompaq is a full-scale personal computer with all the bells and whistles, as well as a telephone handset, that does everything short of doing the talking for you.

Nomenclature aside, what the muon refers to is the fact that telephone switching, the technology behind getting your call from home through to Aunt Martha in Kentucky, routed by way of, say, Orlando, Florida, or Bemidji, Minnesota, whichever results in the best economy for the telephone companies, is now almost entirely digital, just as the personal computer is. Since the telephone and the personal computer work in the same way, everyone would naturally prefer to have them combined in one bandy unit. Or so, judging from the flurry of computer phones besetting the marketplace, manufacturers seem to believe.

TNFORTUNATELY for their bottom line, most of these companies will discover that all this elegant merging of technologies is not what the customer wants, at least not at the premium prices currently commanded by the integrated voice data terminals.

Over all, the combination reminds me of the four-color pen I received for Christmas as a child. Being able to slide a yellow, blue, green or red button down the side of the pen and have the appropriate colored ballpoint emerge from the tip was neat. The iplement was somewhat bulky, however, and I never really used implement was somewhat bulky, however, and I never really used it much. Nor, I suspect, did many other people.

From a technical standpoint, it is true that modern telephone network switching systems are looking more and more like digital computers. Even individual handsets are undergoing chip implants, and soon every telephone will be a smart phone. Some of the ramifications might be surprising, however.

For instance, I recently spoke with a man who had been unable to reach me by telephone for a week because of his hospital stay. He had had a bedside phone, but before his stay he had become accustomed to using an antodialer with the numbers he called most commonly programmed into it. He had made calls with a touch of a button for so long he had forgotten all the numbers.

The real puzzlement about the obvious — that telephones and computers will become one — is that the particular lengths to which this evolution will develop is far less certain than its which this evolution will develop is far less certain than its eventuality. An analogy could be drawn between the new "com-punicating" devices and home computers.

That home computers have become part and parcel of all our lives is likewise unarguable. The computer as a general-purpose (Continued on Page 13, Col. 1)

Hints at Change In Output Quotas

Compiled by Our Staff From Disputches
VIENNA — Sheikh Ahmed
Zaki Yamani, the Sandi Arabian structure but that the question of production quotas was still open.

Sheikh Yamani said the primary aim of OPEC's ministerial conference, scheduled to open in Vienna on Friday, was "to protect the price. on Friday, was "to protect the price

He said he did not anticipate any price adjustments but that there might be changes in the organization's production ceilings. "That," he said, "is another matter."

The oil minister of the United Arab Emirates, meanwhile, said the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries was studying "a new way" to prop up sagging oil prices and stabilize sales.

Mana Said al Oteiba said that an advisory panel of six ministers would recommend to a full OPEC conference Friday that prices be kept at $28 a barrel and the production limit maintained at 16 million barrels a day.

Mr. Otelba spoke to reporters after a two-hour meeting of OPEC's Market Monitoring Committee. He is chairman of the committee, which includes Libya, Algeria, Iran, Iraq and Ecnador.

Earlier in the day, Nigeria's oil minister, Tam David-West, said all 13 OPEC member more comments.

13 OPEC member governments had been cheating on cartel price "Our problem is indiscipline and not telling the truth," Mr. David-West said.

The OPEC members are under ressure from market forces to reduce prices, but some countries have said they will family oppose any reductions. They favor further embacks in production.

Industry analysts have said the meeting is likely to be one of OPEC's most difficult. The group is weakened by a decline in deniand and increased production by Britain and other nations outside the OPEC sphere, and has been unable to halt the slide in prices.

U.S. Liability Litigation Takes Toll, Even at Lloyd's, as Profits Tumble

By Bruce Keppel Las Angeles Times Service

LOS ANGELES — For nearly three centuries, Britain's venerable insurance marker, Lloyd's of London, has withstood and richly profited from the periodic turbulence characteristic of the prop-erty-casualty insurance business. But the 1980s have been exceptionally unkind to the industry worldwide—and now Lloyd's is proving not to be

Lloyd's, whose entrepreneurial zeal in insuring almost anything from a communications satellite to a starlet's bust is matched by shrewd assessments of the actual risks involved, paid out more in claims than it received in premiums in 1981, the most recent year for which figures have been

The $55.7-million underwriting loss (based on current exchange rates) was more than offset, however, by investment income earned from the premiums, resulting in a net profit of about $195 million. Still, that was the market's slimmest profit since 1977. Peter North Miller, Lloyd's chairman, said recently in Los Angeles that 1982, now being andited could produce the exchange's first net loss since 1965 and 1966, although not as great as the 8-percent loss in those years.

Mr. Miller, 54, laid much of the blame for Lloyd's change of fortune to liability litigation and large court awards in the United States rather than to the cutthroat competition for premium income that has damaged or destroyed many U.S. insurers. Lloyd's does 35 percent of its business in the United States, he said. "The courts in America tend to throw liability around a bit," Mr. Miller

"Without reform of tort law in the U.S., there will not be a market to cover the liabilities that Americans want to see covered," he said. He cited pollution-cleanup instinance, which is now both required and difficult to find as a result of regulatory uncertainty in the United States and multi-billion-dollar litigation, such as that which followed New York's Love Canal disaster involving pollution caused by chemical wastes near Niagara

Mr. Miller has been voicing his warning across the United States, speaking to the National Associ-ation of Insurance Brokers and the National Association of Insurance Commissioners.

As if underlining the urgency of the industry's concern, a San Francisco Superior Court jury decided May 31 that Manville Corp., which is struggling with large damage claims for asbestos por soning from exposures dating back decades, had hability insurance during key periods more than half a century ago — even though the actual

VW Posts Profit In Half After Year-Ago Loss

By Warren Getler
International Herald Tribune

BERLIN - Volkswagenwerk AG, West Germany's largest auto-maker, said Thursday that it had net group profit of 280 million Deutsche marks ($92 million) in the first half of this year compared with a 162-million-DM loss in the same period a year earlier.

It was the company's best firsthalf performance in the last few years. VW also posted a first-half loss, of 147 billion DM, in 1983. Carl H. Hahn, managing board chairman, told the annual share-holders meeting that group revenue rose 20 percent in the first half to about 27 billion DM from 1984. But Mr. Hahn cautioned that first-half sales growth — distorted by the impact of a major strike that cut into last year's first-half revenues — could not be used as a gauge for full-year performance. Mr. Hahn said the relationship of VW's profits to sales continued of VW's profits to sales continued to be unsatisfactory, despite showing an improvement in the profit margin from the end of 1984.

VW posted consolidated net profits of 228 million DM in 1984 on record sales of 45.7 billion DM, yielding a profit-sales ratio of 1.5 percent, VW restored a dividend of 5 DM and 1984 percent. 5 DM on 1984 results, after two years without dividends.

Mr. Hahn did not offer projections for the full year but said VW expects "steady" second-half earnings. Officials said VW had been encouraged by an increase of more than 10 percent in domestic orders in the first five months, compared with a year earlier.

Mr. Hahn said results in the second half would depend partly on the course of the U.S. dollar, as well as on political and economic uncertainties in other foreign markets where VW is active.

Concerns about foreign markets center on political murest in South Africa, where VW's operations continue to post losses, and on economic troubles in Mexico, Argenti-na and Brazil, Mr. Hahn said. Mr. Hahn said worldwide VW deliveries were up 4 percent to 1.2 million units while domestic deliveries - hampered by a debate over emissions controls — trailed the year-earlier results by 3 percent at 382 000 units.

Exports from West Germany to the rest of Western Europe in the first half totaled 402,000 units, with Italy showing particularly strong gains, Mr. Hahn said. Exports to the United States from West Germany increased 4.2 percent to 86,000 units, while overall U.S. sales, including U.S. production, was up 2 percent to 146,000.

Helped by sales of the its new

Helped by sales of the its new Golf model, VW raised its domes-tic market share to a 28.7 percent from 27.8 at the end of last year. Mr. Hahn said the rapid rise of VW's share price on West German stock exchanges this year pointed to investor confidence in the future profitability of VW. Its shares have become one of the top performers on the Frankfurt Stock Exchange this year, climbing to 345 DM from 203 DM at the end of 1984 and

Consortium to Promote Channel Tunnel Plan

By Colin Chapman International Herald Tribuna
LONDON — Entroroute Ltd., a British-French consortium propos-ing to build a 35-kilometer (22-mile) road-rail bridge and tunnel across the English Channel, the busiest seaway in the Western hemisphere, announced Thursday that it would spend £10 million ($13.11 million) in making propos-als to the British and French gov-ernments before the Oct. 31 dead-

Nigel Broackes, who is also chairman of the construction group, Trafalgar House PLC, told representatives of British investment institutions that "after so many false starts, it is going to happeal.

The Euroroute plan provides for a series of road bridges, 50 meters above high water, from each side of the channel to two man-made isnds offshore. The islands would se joined by two 20-kilometer prefabricated tunnels laid on the sea-bed, allowing for shipping to pro-ceed unhindered. A separate rail tunnel would run across the chan-

Total of Jobless Drops in Britain

LONDON — Seasonally adjusted unemployment in Britain fell in June by 7,400 people, the first decline since April 1984, the Department of Employment announced Thursday. The seasonally adjusted fig-ore—considered the best guide to job trends — registered the biggest fall since August 1979. But 3,169,600 people or 13.1 percent of the British work force are still jobless, the same percentage as in May. Employpercentage as in May, Employment Secretary Tom King said the fall in unemployment and the increase in job vacancies to their highest level since March 1980 were "clearly good news" and "add up to the best month for more than five years."

Neil Kinnock leader of the Neil Kinnock, leader of the opposition Labor Party, said of the latest figures: "I am obvi-ously pleased at any downturn in the trend. But sadly that evi-dence is tiny and temporary. "At this rate, it will take 25 years to get back to the unemployment levels of 1979 — that is how far this country has fall-en" under Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher, he said.

other major alternative tunnel proposed by the Channel Tunnel Group, a British consor-tium with French backing—it was "three times as effective and likely to produce three times the earnings."

He said Euroconte had appointed the merchant bankers, Kleinwort Benson Ltd., as financial advisers, with Barcinys Bank PLC as lead managers in arranging financ-ing in Britain. Both had agreed to become shareholders. The London firm of Casenove has been appointed stockbrokers.

ners include Trafalgar House PLC ners include Trafalgar House PLC, British Steel Corp., British Shipbuilders and John Howard & Co., will apply to the British government for permission to build and operate the program. The conscrium's French partners, Société Générale, Banque Paribas, GTM Entrepose, Alsthom and Chantiers de l'Atlantique, will make a similar application to the French government. If successful the two openizations will jointly place the design and construction contracts.

Sir Nigel said the lead contract would be British and French, but that much of the work would be subcontracted, with initial tendering limited to companies in the European Community countries.

The new chief executive of Eurosome Construction Ltd., Bob Sellier, estimated that if approval was given, it would take one year to marshal the resources for the project for wears to build the builder. marshal the resources for the project, five years to build the budge and a further year to complete the tunnels. Dangers of a cost overrun were unlikely, he said, because no new technology was involved, with the majority of the work being prefabricated in France and Britain under factors conditions. under factory conditions.

Mr. Sellier said the 500-meter (1,640-foot) bridge spans would be supported by concentric concrete cylinders that would be strong enough to withstand a blow from a 300,000-ton supertanker striking them at 17 knots. Each bridge span would be independent, so that "if a kamikaze pilot flew into one of them, there would be no danger of the whole structure buckling."

The roads from the bridges would drop into the tunnels through a spiral descending at a 3.5-percent grade built inside 260meter-wide concrete cylinders, constructed on existing sandbanks. These new island would offer hotels, restaurants and a yacht haven.

Horten Profit Declines 44%

DUSSELDORF — Horten AG, the West German department store chain, said Thursday that parent company net profit fell 44 percent to 20 million Deutsche marks (66.57 million Deutsche marks) ($6.57 million) from 36 million DM in the year ended Feb. 28. The company said it had reduced its dividend to 4 DM from 6 DM. A spokeswoman said profit was hit by low consumer spending as a result of poor weather, labor disputes and an increased tendency towards saving. The same factors depressed parent company turnover by 1.9 percent to 2.87 billion DM.

U.S. Liability Litigation Cases Cause Profits at Lloyd's to Drop

That was good news for Denver-based Manville, but it sent another shudder through the aiready reeling property-casualty insurance in-

Court interpretations have in the past led to huge liability awards and created uncertainty for insurers, Mr. Miller said. Insurers must be able to calculate the true nature of the risks they are underwriting, he explained, and that is complicat-ed by shifting interpretations of what constitutes liability. "Lloyd's will insure almost any-

Far more uncharacteristic is the persistent whift of financial scandal that has tainted a handful of its 384 insurance syndicates in recent years — scandals regarding misus

These events, whose very rarity provoked considerable press attention, triggered an investigation that produced a 1982 parliamentary re-form increasing the authority of Lloyd's management to regulate the agents and brokers who do ess in its bustling Underwriting Room in the City of London, the financial district.

The scandals have also called into question Lloyd's chibby traditions in which a member's word is considered sacred, a handshake binding and full disclosure as-sumed. Those traditions have shaped the Lloyd's heritage of always paying off on claims -whether during the Napoleonic

FACT or FICTION? 800% PROFITS

During drooping markets, CGR mused... "To urge readers to buy COCA COLA $31, GENERAL ELECTRIC $60, GENERAL MOTOR $39, SEARS $18, and a veritable host of undervalued equities may seem futile, for the declining DOW has triggered man's manic-depressive nature. Ignore prophets of despain, buy now..."

2-1 split) G.M. raced past $ 84, SEARS soared to $ 62, and subsequently split. Once again, the "contrarian" triumphed. When the "Group" was floundering, castigated as losers," by analysts who know, to paraphrase Oscar Wilde, "the price of everything and the value of nothing" we remained optimistic, flouting prevailing opinion.

After the faded "blue chips" regained their roseate color, the "Street" leaped on the Bandwagon, chasing upticks to the cadence of the "Crowd," as our clients debarked, clutching "Contrarian" profits. The buy on "the bad news brigade" is perenially under-manned; the majority of mortals mock common sense, buying into strength, selling into weakness.

Our infatuation for stocks that are maligned by the media and the "Street" has been documented. Not that we are blind bulls; our researchers have compiled high marks for "shorting" bloated equities during the euphoria for absurdly-priced, When the Street was rhapsodizing over APPLE at $ 56, COLECO around $ 50,

COMMODORE at $ 56 and TANDY at $ 54, we heard discordant notes, and urged readers to "short" the Quartet. APPLE tarnished to $15, COLECO $10, COMMODORE capsized under $ 9, TANDY tremored below $ 25. It is imperative to fathom that this is a market of stocks, not a stock market, each equity has its unique dynamics; or malaise. Our forthcoming report focuses upon seasoned shares that offer 50% or greater gains, with minimal risk. In addition, we highlight a low-priced, special situation, that can catapult, emulating a recently recommended, "emerging equity" that escalated 800% in less than a year. Because of Managing Director - SASOL Limited the threat of oil embargoes against South Africa, production is a closely guarded secret but SASOL provides a significant proportion of South Africa's petroleum needs. The country has large oil stockpiles which, together with synfuel production, will see it through any crisis. SASOL mines 36-million tons of coal a year for its own purposes. Jointly, with Total, it also owns and operates Natref, the only inland refinery for imported crude oil in South Africa. In addition, it produces a host of chemicals, industrial gas, fertilisers and explosives. It started "downstream diversification" from the two big new plants only recently and is already a major force in a variety of

In fuels, SASOL competes mainly against oil-importing multinationals. Soon there could be more competition, for a gas and oil deposit has been discovered off the east coast of South Africa. In addition other South African companies are eager to start synfuel projects.

Mr. Stegmann, who has been with SASOL virtually since its inception in fuel markets, inflation and the decline of the South African currency are some of the 1950s, describes the history: "South Africa has nearly every natural resource but was reminded forcibly in World War II that it lacked oil. We had plentiful coal, however and long before the war scientists started dreaming about oil from coal. The Germans and the Americans had shown it could be done. "Dr. Etienne Rousseau, later to become the first Managing Director of SASOL, was asked by the independent mining house, Anglovaal, to investigate the viability of an indigenous synthetic fuel industry. "There were two choices - the direct and indirect liquefaction routes. Because of the properties of our coal and the simpler technology, Dr. Rousseau preferred the latter, which entailed gasification, followed by synthesis over catalysts. "After Dr. Rousseau had surveyed all the work done in the field, Anglovaal found itself heavily committed in gold mining. It felt it could not proceed because of the

"Meanwhile, the Korean War was a further reminder of this country's vulnerability, so the Government took over the project. SASOL - known initially as the South African Coal, Oil and Gas Corporation Ltd. - was registered in SASOL THREE is in full production and viable but the listed company will October 1950. acquire the outstanding 50 per cent of this unit from the State only when mar-kets and cash flow permit. Meantime, *Construction of SASOL ONE was problematical. The plant was due to cost £18-million and eventually cost £40million. There were acute teething problems. Operating losses in the early years mounted to £24-million and it took quite a lot of courage to continue. "Lurgi of Germany was our partner on the gasification side where there were no problems. The problems were in synthesis. After two years we broke with the American licensors in 1957. We went on to develop our own synthol process, the heart of indirect liquefaction.

"So we had a viable oil-from-coal industry before South Africa became politically unpopular in the early 1960s. At that time, we were asked whether it would be advisable to build another SASOL but we advised against it.

"International oil prices were low but international inflation meant building costs would be prohibitive. We advised the government to stockpile oil instead. SASOL was later put in charge of stock-piling which started in the mid 1960s. Relative to demand, we have the biggest stockpile in the world.

This shows that the emphasis in SASOL has been on commercial viability rather than on strategic need.

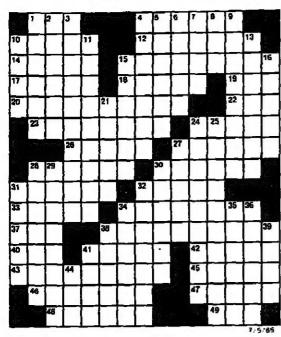

Then came the first oil crisis of 1973. This made a second SASOL economically feasible. In 1974, SASOL TWO was mooted. We started building in Sep-tember 1976 and achieved mechanical completion in April 1981.

The decision to build an identical SASOL THREE next to SASOL TWO was taken in January 1979, shortly after the fall of the Shah of Iran.

"On this occasion, we acted for strategic, rather than commercial reasons but the project outlook was so sound economically that SASOL was privatised in October that year. We produced our first gas at SASOL THREE in 1983. Had Iran not cut off our oil supplies, we would not have started on SASOL THREE until the mid-1980s."

As it turned out, SASOL saved two years and $500-million in capital costs in going ahead. Then it also avoided numerous pitfalls by duplicating SASOL TWO. Both plants were made even more viable by the second oil crisis of 1979.

The prices SASOL receives for its petroleum products are determined by dollar-determined international oil prices. A 40% decline in the value of the South African Randagainst the dollar has ensured good profitability in spite of disarray in international oil markets.

THE SEVEN DAY CIRCLE: The History and Meaning of the Week

By Eviatar Zerubavel. 206 pages. $16.95. The Free Press. 866 Third Avenue, New York, N. Y. 10022.

Reviewed by John Gross

D AYS, months and years were given to us by nature, but we invented the week for ourselves. There is nothing inevitable about a seven-day cycle, or about any other kind of week; it represents an arbitrary rhythm unre-lated to anything in the natural order. But where the week exists — and there have been many cultures where it did not —it is so deeply embedded in our experience that we hardly ever question its rightness, or think of it as an artificial convention; for most of us it a matter of "second nature."

This is Eviatar Zerubavel's starting point in his fascinating account of how the week originated and how it stamps our lives. In the course of "The Seven Day Circle" Zerubavel, a professor of sociology at the State University of New York at Stony Brook, unearths a good deal of curious incidental detail, but his chief concern is with the ways in which a cultural concept enters our consciousness to the point that it feels like a natural phenomenon. The fact that no one has taken a comprehensive look at his subject until now testifies to how much it is like part of the air we breathe. The origins of the week as we know it are twofold. It represents a convergence between traditional Jewish cosmology, with its belief in the seven days of the Creation, and ancient astrology, which was based on what were then thought to be the seven planets. The seven-day cycles thrown up by these systems evolved quite independently of each other, although behind both there may ultimately lie a belief in the mystical properties of the number seven that can be found in the civilizations of Assyria and Babylonia.

The Jewish week turns on the importance of the Sabbath. (It has nothing to do with the lunar cycle; indeed, Zerubavel points out that "the rise of the Sabbath cult within Judaism coincided with the withdrawal from worshiping the celestial bodies, and particularly the moon.") Initially, Christians continued this tradition, celebrating Sunday — the Lord's Day, the day of the Resurrection - in addition to the Sabbath rather than as a substitute for it; when Sunday observance eventually replaced Sabbath observance (a movement pioneered by Saint Ignatius toward the end of the first century) it was in order to distance Christianity from Judaism by means of what Zember calls "calendrical" calls "calendrical contrast." The same principle can be seen at work in Mohammed's choice of Friday as the chief day of public worship in Islam. As the Christian week was diffused through the Roman Empire, it came up against its astrological counterpart, a Hellenistic invention that had evolved in Alexandria and been imported into the West after Julius Caesar's conquest of Egypt. By this time, the astrological week, with each day assigned to a different planet, was too entrenched to be eliminated at a stroke. Just how stubbornly it held its own is evident when you consider all the European languages where the names of days are derived from the Roman planetary derties or their Nordic opposite numbers.

For a time, as the Romans gradually adjusted to it, the seven-day week overlapped with an eight-day week they had inherited from the Etruscans, a cycle built around a fixed market day. Zerubavel draws a parallel with contemporary West Africa, where the seven-day week frequently coexists with indigenous market cycles, and more generally he stresses how often the evolution of the week seems to have coincided with the emergence of a market economy. But there are other types of weekly cycle as well, usually based on a system of divination Zerubavel describes a number of them, including a fantastically elaborate method of reckoning that evolved on the island of Java around the ninth century and gradually spread to other parts of Indonesia: each day has nine names. because it can be thought of in nine different contexts.

In his final chapters, Zerubavel returns to our relatively plain seven-day week and considers what it has come to mean in terms of our experience and our habitual assumptions. Here as elsewhere he draws on a richly varied range of evidence. Discussing Monday, for example, he weighs the folklore of absenteeism against statistics about the greater prevalence of sui-cides and cardiac deaths at the start of the working week; he tells us that in France poorly-made cars are often referred to as "Monday products"; he is equally at his case quoting. Charlotte Bronte and Garfield the cat (who once defined Monday as "a day designed to add depression to an otherwise nappy week?

Are we likely to see any great change in the way we divide our days? Zerubavel gives an interesting account of two attempts to reshape the calendar drastically, one during the French:

Revolution and one under Stain. Both failed chiefly because they were aggressively ideolog-ical in inspiration and a point-blank challenge to traditional beliefs.

This is a field where people tend to be strongly conservative; even the mildest proposals for rationalizing the calendar have almost always foundered in the face of deep social resistance. But piecemeal shifts of emphasis are another matter, especially when they reflect new economic realities, and Zembavel sees no reason why in time we should not get used to murmuring "Thank God it's Thursday."

"The Seven Day Circle" is a fine blend of a wide-ranging cultural history and imaginative's sociology. My only complaint against it is that

The simple answer is nothing.

The more complex answer has to do with a scale that seeks to balance fairness on one side against the cumulative weight of a person's public behavior on the other. Sometimes the best you can hope for is that it turns out even in the end. And in this case it seems to be seeking

Brian Moore: Malibu 'Writer's Writer'

By Elizabeth Venant Los Angeles Times Service

MALIBU, California — In the literary wilds of Southem California, where screenwriters constitute the predominant fauna, Brian Moore is a rara avis, the serious novelist.

Holed up in a beach house perched high above the Pacific, the native Irishman has crafted his books.

At the age of 64 he has achieved the distinction, unusual among American writers, of recognition derived from a body of works — 13 novels published over 30 years - rather than a monumental best-seller. His coterie of admirers includes Kingsley Amis, Joan Didion — a longtime friend - and Graham Greene, who calls Moore "my favorite living novelist."

Now "Black Robe," published this spring by E. P. Dutton, has been lauded in The New York Times Book Review, and Moore is at work on a film script of it. But none of those weighty attributes has managed to encumber the writer. ber the writer.

Sitting in his breezy living room and sipping a glass of wine, he skewers dullards — lampooning "an iron butterfly" of an editor and moaning over a literary lunch during which his hosts did not so much as wet their whistles. They drank fruit juice. Can you

Yet Moore is hardly a social gadabout. Twe always felt you need a core of dullness in your life to write novels," he said.

He expresses distaste for literary celebrities who wreck their talents on party circuits. And he tells how, after a stint as a New York writer, he escaped 18 years ago to the "nonliterary territory" of Southern California. He came to do the film script for Alfred Hitchcock's "Torn Curtain," but the movie was not a success and Moore continued happily in the status of "writer's writer." He is still better known in Britain and Canada than in the United States.

On weekends, small gatherings of writers and academics find their way to Moore's redwood cabin. Once a week he drives into town to teach a creative writing course at the University of California, Los Angeles. For three months a year he travels with his wife, Jean, to Canada, Britain and France, osmotically gathering inspiration for his books.

Over the years, Moore's inspirations have continually varied He wrote about an alcoholic Irish spinster in his first novel, "The Lonely Passion of Judith Hearne," which brought him immediate literary acclaim. He portrayed the artist chained to his creations in "The Great Victorian Collection.

In "Black Robe" he recounts a "Heart of Darkness" tale of a 17th-century French Jesuit who travels into the Canadian wilderness to save Indian souls. Criticized at times for tackling subjects that do not quite work, Moore has nevertheless avoided the creative nemesis of repeating the same old stories.

As Greene has noted, "Each new book of his is unpredictable, dangerous, and amusing. He treats the novel as a tamer treats a wild beast."

Moore writes about ordinary people. "I'm more interested in failure than success," because failure forces people to examine themselves, he said. For Moore, failure generally means a lapse of religious faith. Belief and the lack of it are a recurrent theme, one that is no more in vogue than his personal tone and leitmotif of fantasy are popular in the cool realism of ontemporary American fiction.

Following a long tradition among Irish writers, from Oscar Wilde to James Joyce and Samuel Beckett, Moore abandoned Ireland, judging it "a totally repressive country.

Raised in Belfast, Moore en-dured a stringently Catholic childhood as one of nine children of a prominent doctor. Unable to of a prominent doctor. Unante at bow to religion, he left home at the first chance, joining the British army in World War II, and took with him his literary bible, Joyce's radically anti-clerical "Ulysses."

Moore set out to write about the world. During the war he his craft, "women were more in-landed with the Allies in the teresting to talk to than men be-

south of France, and afterward, while working for the United Na-tions, he visited the Nazi death camp at Auschwitz. Yet when he sat down to write, it was his Irish past that came bubbling up, and in one guise or another he has been whacking away at his Cath-olic beginnings ever since. But his fascination with belief and commitment has become an intellectual pursuit, he said.

"In nearly all my novels I'm interested in the point in a person's life where whatever it is that they wanted or believed in -ambition, political or religious belief - is suddenly taken away from them, and they are forced to re-examine their lives up till then. I like to set my books in that short period of time in which they're like a donkey with a carrot and the carrot is suddenly taken away from the donkey and he doesn't

He is pleased that Canada's International Film Corp., which co-produced Louis Malle's "Atlantic City," is producing "Black Robe," probably in collaboration with a French film company.

Longevity has always been Moore's great interest. He point-ed out that "The Lonely Passion of Judith Hearne" had not been out of print since it was first pub-lished in 1955. "And that cheers me up," he said.

Would he ever consider writing a potboiler, just for the sake of a little lucre?

He laughed. "I once made a bet with a friend that I could write a popular story for the Saturday Evening Post," he said. "It was turned down by the Post and a dozen other slick magazines. You have to have your heart in these
